

A Place to Learn and Live

If you are interested in the world you live in and the way men think and act; if you are interested in finding a purpose in your own working and learning, Black Mountain will attract you.

If you are interested in an education which asks the best you have to give; if you are willing to give yourself to education all day every day; if you can put aside preconceived notions of the world and of yourself, you will like Black Mountain.

Here you will find a college whose faculty consists of a distinguished group of scholars and artists from America and abroad; whose students represent an economic and geographic cross-section of this country, with several coming from foreign lands; a college whose students are characterized by unusual vigor, curiosity and self-reliance.

Admission to Black Mountain does not depend upon financial well-being, or on the results of examinations. It depends upon you: upon what you can give to the community and what you can get from it, upon your potentialities as a constructive person, upon your desire for a better world. While admission requirements are flexible they are based upon ability to carry college work. At present applications from qualified high school juniors will be considered.

Fees are adjusted according to ability to pay and vary from $450 to $1200 a year. Those who can are expected to assume the full cost of their education. Where this is impossible, one may apply in confidence for a reduced fee scholarship.

Black Mountain is situated in the heart of the Great Craggy Mountains of Western North Carolina, 15 miles from Asheville, a section noted for its climate and scenery. Altitude 2,400 feet.

For more information about Black Mountain, or an application blank, write to the Registrar, Black Mountain College, Black Mountain, North Carolina.